

The SARS CoV2 pandemic situation and the intensive care in it creates a situation that is special also considering its psychological aspects for each and every individual who's taking part in it. Concluding from this the psychological support given there should be adapted to this in its nature and form also. In this presentation I would like to summarize the characteristics of this burden and the possibilities of psychological support and intervention. I will consider the burden of the doctors, nurses and all medical staff, the patient's special psychological state and the family members' relation to this situation. From the professionals' side it's similar to the handling of mass casualty incidents, there are too many patients and fewer medical personnel available, with less resources, triage must be done and besides these the illness itself causes a lot of death. These experiences are potentially traumatizing for each participants of the situation, that we must pay attention to in the long-term either.
